

subsidies—the appropriation of wealth by capitalist enterprise, by trade, by the rendering of services—wealth—the influence of the spirit of kindness—services rendered by the rich—the prospects of Socialism.

CHAPTER XVI

MODERN POLITICS.....	311
----------------------	-----

The multiplicity of the interests that are aroused by modern politics—the simplicity of ancient political ideals—the head of the herd—the council of patriarchs—the warrior king—the religious authority—the conflict between monarchy and aristocracy—the interference of the masses—how their introduction to politics came about—fundamental distinction between democracy and the political liberty of particular classes—although gratified by the possession of the franchise, the people are not generally anxious to exercise it—the stimulus of emulation or party feeling—the party system and the group system—efficiency and prospects of the latter—the effect upon elections of jealousy and chauvinism—weakness of democracy in foreign affairs—the party pendulum—influence of an earnest desire for reform—so far has expressed itself generally in non-official propaganda—its prospects of increased authority—declining status of professional politicians—local government independent of party feeling—a review of the various impulses or ideals which have operated at various times to bring about political reform—the fundamental influences of national character—political progress by imitation—the unrest occasioned by each change of ideal—conclusion.